Uncanny Recognition

It has been reported that mothers can identify their newborn babies by smell, but it has also been demonstrated that they can identify them by blind touch, as well. Results of a series of studies demonstrated uncanny maternal recognition ability.

In the first study, 42 post-partum women who had spent at least 1 hour with their newborns were asked to select purely by smell a t-shirt worn by their infant. Each woman was asked to sniff three bags, each of which contained a shirt worn by a newborn, only one of which was worn by their own. 100% of the women were able to choose correctly the shirt worn by their own offspring.

In a second study, 68 new mothers, with their eyes and noses covered, were asked to identify their own infants purely by touch. 69% were able to do so by simply touching their newborn's hand. When asked how they did so, most said they recognized either the texture or temperature of their infant's skin. 40%, however, said they could not identify any particular sensory cue—they just "knew" it was their baby.

Just as a mother knows her child, God also knows His children.

Jeremiah 1:5

Before I formed you in your mother's womb, I knew you.

I hope you moms have a blessed Mother's Day. I love you all.
